Background

Gender-based violence (GBV) perpetrated by males against women, women's vulnerability, and women's exploitation are inextricably linked phenomena. On the one hand, GBV is one of the root causes of women's vulnerability in that it directly contributes to it and explains some of its specific features; on the other hand, male violence is a crucial mechanism through which women's vulnerability and subjugation are maintained, reproduced and reinforced. Both male perpetrators of violence against women and exploiters use power control to dominate their victims and use "tactics" that are largely equivalent.

Recent observations on the evolution of trafficking and other severe forms of exploitation at national and EU level, including, for example, research conducted on Nigerian young women and girls who apply for international protection, show that family members and other male people in intimate relationship with the concerned women play a crucial role in forcing them to migrate and expose themselves to extremely harmful situations. The reason why young women leave their countries and enter or are driven into exploitation circuits is often because they are mandated to economically support their male partner or male components of their families. Indeed, violence by the intimate partner or other multiple forms of family violence against women are very often at the origin of situations of exploitation, and not simply a by-product of them. For women involved in such dynamics the outcome can be prostitution (irrespective of the policies of toleration or repression adopted at the national levels), or a variety of different forms of severe abuse where gender plays a prominent role.

A correlation between GBV, migration, the "status" of women in the "host" countries and women's severe exploitation is nowadays largely reported by any agencies dealing with victims of trafficking in human beings. The quantitative and qualitative determination of such factors however have not been thoroughly and consistently investigated. The workshop will try to introduce and discuss this correlation and the operational implications of linking in a consistent and systematic way severe forms of women's exploitation to GBV. In other words, this workshop intends to add elements for providing a more accurate and evidence-based description and categorization of the violence affecting migrant women, including those who are victims of trafficking in human beings, also with the aim to improve strategies of healing, support, rehabilitation, access to justice for abused women and preventing re-victimisation.
